Why Sit-Stand Desks are making a move?

From the first day of school we are all told to sit at our desks. At university we sit in lectures and then at work many people will sit at a desk in the office. So from a very young age most of us will sit for many hours every day.

However health professionals and ergonomists agree that the human body is not designed to sit for long periods of time. Epidemiological studies confirm that people who work in a sitting position are at a greater risk of suffering back problems. This is just the tip of the iceberg for employers. Research into work place injury and the impact on productivity and employee well being has identified prolonged sitting as a contributor to deep vein thrombosis, back and neck soreness, numbness in the legs and obesity.

Increasingly organizations are becoming aware of the benefits of Sit-Stand desks and workstations. With staff now the number one cost to business, productivity improvements have a major impact on the bottom line. Attracting and retaining good staff and maintaining their health and well being is now being recognized as fundamental to good corporate citizenship.

The key benefits of incorporating DESKLINE® Sit-Stand technology into all office environments include reduced absenteeism, lower staff turnover, fewer workplace insurance claims, improved alertness, concentration and accuracy and fewer and shorter work breaks. Adjusting the posture from sitting to standing during the working day improves blood circulation and activates the major muscles in the lower back, buttocks and upper legs. Research indicates that standing burns up to 40% more kilojoules than maintaining a static seated position.

DESKLINE® Sit-Stand technology allows for quick and easy adjustment, suits all workers, enables desk sharing and assists in returning special needs groups back into the workforce. Sit- Stand systems also have multi use applications including reception desks, board room tables, laboratory benches and lecterns.

DESKLINE® systems lead the world in electric Sit-Stand technology and now supply major Australian commercial furniture manufacturers. Offering effortless height adjustment, safety protection and very low power consumption DESKLINE® is the perfect partner to build corporate social responsibility and employee engagement.
